The Queen Creek Unified School District prepares for crisis situations in a proactive and collaborative manner. The 6,000-student suburban unified school district has a thorough and current crisis management plan that includes different roles for the crisis management team.

Bomb threats, excessive heat, active shooters, airplane crashes, and many other contingencies are both planned for and used in preparedness drills to keep students and staff safe.

The district follows the National Incident Management System (NIMS), which is a government program that provides information for individuals and organizations on how to be proactive in preparing for and handling various incidents. Within the program is the Incident Command System (ICS), which outlines an approach for coordinating the efforts of responders.

The Safety, Crisis, and Emergency Committee is a joint committee that the district sponsors and that involves officials from the town of Queen Creek along with police officers, firefighters, and school district officials. This collaborative committee meets monthly to discuss different aspects of crisis management, including prevention measures, intervention, appropriate reaction, and mitigation. They also discuss following through on the aftermath of a crisis.

This process of consistent communication and collaboration is pivotal in assisting the school district to work appropriately with our community partners in times of crisis.
